Analysis of Bach's fugue BWV 850 in D Major (WTC I)

Bach's title suggests that he had written for a (12-note) well-tempered tuning system in which all keys sounded in tune (also known as "circular temperament"). The opposing system in Bach's day was meantone temperament [citation needed] in which keys with many accidentals sound out of tune. (See also musical tuning.) Bach would have been familiar with different tuning systems, and in particular as an organist would have played instruments tuned to a meantone system.

Analysis of Bach's fugue BWV 871 in C minor (WTC, Book II)

It is sometimes assumed that Bach intended equal temperament, the standard modern keyboard tuning which became popular after Bach's death, but modern scholars suggest instead a form of well temperament. [4] There is debate whether Bach meant a range of similar temperaments, perhaps even altered slightly in practice from piece to piece, or a single specific "well-tempered" solution for all purposes.

Description by James Reel This is one of Bach 's most searching, questioning preludes, and imaginative use of the key gives this prelude-and-fugue pair a harmonic and textural richness. The principal melody maintains steady motion; accompaniment is sometimes chordal, but often imitative of the treble line.
